Paris to the Past. Author Ina Caro's intriguing idea was "to travel by train through the history of France, taking day trips from central Paris ... traveling in chronological order to a different century each day, and returning to Paris each evening.". Dividing the book into the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, 17th-century France, 18th-century Paris, and Napoleon and the Restoration, the author visits from three to ten destinations for each era, devoting a chapter to each trip.

Thus any goods or passengers requiring transportation from Lyon to Clermont-Ferrand in 1860 needed to take a circuitous route via Paris of over seven hundred kilometers, even though a mere hundred and twenty kilometers separated the two cities. This centering on Paris led to inefficiency in the Franco-Prussian War (1870 - 1871). The Prusso-German railway lines, inter-connected in a grid-like fashion, proved far more efficient at advancing troops and supplies to the front than the French one.
